The relations between Italy and the Congo Free State, a 'personally-owned colony' of of , started from 1884. A largely overlooked role of Italian citizens and the government in the "Congo question" has been linked to the events that led the State of Congo and its associated private companies to involve a significant number of civilian and military officials of Italian origin. In particular, a group of officers of the was sent to the Congo in 1903 for a three-year term, within an agreement which also foresaw the settlement of Italian colonists in the interior of the country. In the same period, Leopold II organised a propaganda campaign in Italy with the aim of obtaining a favorable outcome for the agreement. The Italian government played a relatively neutral role, as it was mainly concerned with pursuing a policy of Italian "presence" in Central . The independence of the Belgian colony seemed stable until 1955. The first reports concerning independence were sent from the embassy starting on June 8, 1960. The main concerns seemed to come from the fate of the Italian colonists. In , the Italian consul general, Vittorio Mascia, on May 18, 1960, noted that tension had risen in the context of the elections in Congo. The Italian settlers were restless: some women and children had fled the country. He asked the Belgians to strengthen their security apparatus and to appoint a minister to reside in Congo "until independence". By the time of the celebration of the declaration of independence of Congo, on June 30, 1960, the Italian delegation was significantly reduced. The president of the Italian republic, talked to the Congolese prime minister, ; the t.
